What is Trove?

Trove is an online search engine developed by the National Library of Australia. At the click of a button, you can access a large and unrivalled repository of Australian material.

Why is Trove useful?

- Search multiple Australian collections across millions of items at once.
- Find and get information in context — instantly.
- Tag, add comments and organise your results.
- Explore a wealth of resources and digital content like never before, including full-text books, journal and newspaper articles, images, music, sound, video, maps, websites, diaries, letters, archives, people and organisations.

Who is Trove for?

Trove makes finding and getting information easier for all Australians. It provides a quick, simple and powerful way to search. Finding information is more effortless and enjoyable than ever before.

Have your say …

Trove enables users to tag, comment and improve data, organise their results and upload their own images into the service. Users are encouraged to engage with the service and to give feedback, which will be used to drive future developments.

Where does the content come from?

The content is from the National Library of Australia, the state and territory libraries and over 1000 other libraries around Australia. Trove also features content from other Australian collections, including those of cultural, business and educational organisations, and major international digital collections. Trove’s content will continue to grow as the service develops and other organisations become involved.
